GEORGE L. MACKELLAR

George Lardie MacKellar was born in Detroit, Michigan, on March 16, 1918, the second son of Malcolm and Bertha Esther MacKellar. When he was two years old, the family moved to Los Angeles. (George often remarked that he was not very bright as a child because it took him two years to leave the cold Michigan climate.)

George always looked up to his older brother Archie, and the boys often got into scrapes together. When George was seven, his sister Kathleen was born. All three children had red hair, fair skin and lots of freckles. George also had a temper to match his hair. Unfortunately, he was small, and soon learned that he could neither win a fight, nor run away fast enough; so he learned to control his temper.

When George was ten, his mother decided to drive the children back to Michigan for a visit. The roads were primitive and difficult, but she was determined. That summer George learned about his large, extended family. Memories of this trip were among his favorites.
